
The Abandonment Wound — Going Deeper

Inner child, triggers and new patterns

Volume 2 · going deeper · 4 axes — by EvaTalk

TO BEGIN

Inner child, triggers and new patterns

You now know your wound and its mechanisms. This Volume 2 takes you further: to the root, where the wound formed, to heal it deeply.

Over about 30 days, you'll meet your inner child, defuse your triggers, and anchor new patterns. Go at your pace — it's gentle but deep work.

YOUR INTENTION

What you'd like to heal more deeply: _____

Going to the root

At the bottom of every wound is a child who suffered. It's the child who feared being left alone, and learned to dread every separation. Reparenting means offering them today what they lacked: a reassuring presence.

Turning toward that child with tenderness repairs what words alone can't reach.

Example

By reassuring the child within her ('I'm here, you're safe'), Léa felt her panic ease.

Meet the child

Picture the child you were when the wound formed. What did they need and not receive?

Reparenting

Write them the line that soothes: 'I'm here, you are safe, you won't be left alone.'

Takeaway — You can offer your inner child today what they lacked.

Spotting what reactivates the wound

Some situations relight the wound instantly: a silence, a distance, the other busy or away. The body reacts before the thought. Learning to spot that spike means taking back control.

Between the trigger and your reaction, there's a space — that's where you can choose.

Example

With no reply for hours, Marc felt panic rise — then remembered distance isn't abandonment.

My trigger map

Note 2 situations that reactivate your wound, and what you feel in your body.

Defuse in the moment

When abandonment panic rises: breathe slowly, and remind yourself 'I'm safe, even alone in this moment'.

Takeaway — Between the trigger and your reaction is a space to choose.

Replacing the old protection

Your old reflex (clinging, seeking reassurance, panicking) protected you, but it traps you. The new pattern is: self-soothing, calmly expressing your need. At first it's uncomfortable — that's normal, you're unlearning an old habit.

Each repetition of the new gesture carves a new path.

Example

Rather than send ten messages, Nia soothed herself first, then calmly expressed her need.

My new pattern

Old reflex → new gesture: write your new response for next time.

The smallest step

The smallest new gesture you can take this week: _____

Takeaway — Clinging turns into 'I soothe myself, then express calmly'.

The 30-day work

Deep healing happens over time and gentle repetition — not in a day. For 30 days, give yourself a daily moment where you self-soothe — an anchor that depends on no one. Relapses are part of the path: they don't erase your progress.

If the work stirs up too much, a professional can support you — that's a strength, not a failure.

Example

Rather than aiming for perfection, Nia practiced one small gesture each day. In a month, her default reaction had changed.

My daily ritual

A small healing gesture to repeat each day for 30 days: _____

Welcome the relapse

Write: 'A relapse doesn't erase my progress — I resume, gently.'

Takeaway — Deep healing happens through gentle repetition, over time.

Key takeaways

- Under the wound is a child to reparent with tenderness.
- Spot the spike in your body before it commands you.
- Between the trigger and your reaction is a space to choose.
- The new pattern is uncomfortable at first — that's normal.
- Deep healing happens through gentle repetition over 30 days.
- Relapses don't erase progress; a professional can support you.

Your turn

My inner child

Their need	My reparenting line

My new pattern

My trigger	My new gesture

YOUR JOURNEY

Your 4-week plan

Week 1

Meet and reparent my inner child.

Week 2

Map my triggers.

Week 3

Anchor my new pattern.

Week 4

Set my daily ritual.

YOUR PLAN

Your action plan

My reparenting line:

My new gesture facing the trigger:

My daily ritual (30 days):

You can be your own safety, even in solitude.

This deepening guide is a coaching and psychoeducation tool — not therapy. Inner-child work can stir up strong emotions: go at your pace, and don't hesitate to seek support. In a very hard time, reach out to a crisis line in your country. © PerfectMatch · EvaTalk.