BEFORE YOU BEGIN

Easing the jealousy that takes over

Jealousy is human — but when it takes over everything (suspicion, control, anxiety), it eats at the relationship and makes you suffer. Behind it, there's almost always a fear and a wound.

This guide helps you understand what your jealousy hides, strengthen your inner security, and defuse it concretely.

Your intention

A situation that triggers your jealousy: _____

The 4 approaches

This guide works your topic through 4 complementary psychology lenses. Read, do the exercises, fill the workbook — at your own pace.

Psychodynamic — understand the root.

CBT — ease the negative thoughts.

Humanistic — reconcile with yourself.

Systemic — act on your environment.

What jealousy hides

Overwhelming jealousy often masks a fear of abandonment, a wound of betrayal, or an old insecurity. It speaks more of your history than of the other.

Understanding the wound beneath is the start of healing it.

Example

Betrayed in the past, Marc suspected his partner without cause. Linking his jealousy to that wound helped him ease it.

The wound beneath

What fear or wound does your jealousy wake (abandonment, betrayal, comparison)?

My history

Have you felt this fear before this relationship? When?

→ My jealousy speaks of my wound — more than of the other.

Jealous thoughts

Catastrophe scenarios, interpretations ('that smile = they're cheating'), checking on a loop: jealousy feeds on thoughts taken as facts.

Telling fact from interpretation defuses the anxiety.

Example

Sure of an 'obvious' infidelity, Nia separated facts from her interpretations. There remained... no fact.

Fact or interpretation?

For your last episode: what's a FACT? what's my INTERPRETATION?

Stop the checking

Which checks (phone, socials) feed your anxiety? Pick one to stop.

→ An interpretation isn't a fact — I check before suffering.

Strengthening your inner security

The less your worth depends on the other's gaze, the less grip jealousy has. Strengthening your esteem and your own life dries up the source of the anxiety.

Your security is built first within you.

Example

By rebuilding her own confidence, Léa saw her jealousy melt: she no longer felt 'replaceable'.

My inner security

Write 5 reasons to trust your worth, independent of the other.

My own life

Which area of your own could you feed (friends, a passion) to ground yourself?

→ The more my security comes from me, the less grip jealousy has.

Defusing concretely

Concretely: talk about your feeling without accusing or controlling, stop the checking, and agree together on what reassures each of you — without turning the other into a permanent suspect.

Jealousy that turns to control sometimes warrants support.

Example

Instead of accusing, Sofia said 'I'm scared, I need reassurance'. Her partner could respond, without bristling.

Speak without accusing

Reframe a jealous reproach as 'I feel... I need...'.

Our agreements

What would reassure each of you, without control? Note 1-2 possible agreements.

→ Talking about my fear, without controlling, opens dialogue.

Practical tips & advice

Tips & advice

- Tell the real FACT from your INTERPRETATION.
- Talk about your fear in 'I', without accusation or control.
- Stop the checking (phone, socials): it feeds the anxiety.
- Strengthen your esteem and your own life: you're not replaceable.
- Identify the wound under the jealousy (abandonment, betrayal).
- Jealousy that turns to control warrants support.

PLAN

Your 4-week plan

Week 1 — Understand what my jealousy hides.

Week 2 — Separate facts from interpretations.

Week 3 — Strengthen my inner security.

Week 4 — Defuse & dialogue.

Your plan in 3 lines

- The wound under my jealousy:
- The fact (vs interpretation):
- The check I stop:

TO CLOSE

Under jealousy, a fear — ease it from within.
