
Defining the Relationship and Moving Toward Commitment

From 'what are we?' to a real shared project

4 psychology approaches · tips — by EvaTalk

TO BEGIN

From 'what are we?' to a real shared project

At some point, you have to define the relationship: staying vague feeds ambiguity and frustration. And commitment isn't only 'felt' — it's built, through concrete choices.

This guide helps you dare the 'what are we?' conversation, and move, together, toward clear commitment.

YOUR INTENTION

Where you are: vagueness to clarify, exclusivity to set, or commitment to build? _____

Define, rather than endure vagueness

Vagueness often suits whoever invests the least. Defining the relationship (DTR) makes you an actor rather than a spectator of your own story.

Commitment is built through decisions, not only through feelings.

Example

Léa waited for things 'to clarify on their own'; daring to ask gave her a real answer — and power.

Leave the vagueness

Which vagueness would you need to clarify right now?

An actor

Write: 'I have the right to define what I'm living.'

Takeaway — Defining the relationship makes you an actor in your story.

The fear of 'scaring them off'

'If I ask where we stand, I'll scare them off', 'better not ask', 'I'll seem too invested': these thoughts condemn you to vagueness.

Reframe them: clarity attracts the right people and filters out the wrong.

Example

'If I bring it up, it's over' terrified Sami; by asking, he saw only the unavailable ones fled.

Spot the fear

Note a thought that stops you clarifying · a fairer version.

Clarity filters

Write: 'Clarity attracts the right people and filters the rest.'

Takeaway — Asking for clarity only scares off the unavailable.

You have the right to want commitment

Wanting a committed relationship, and saying so, isn't 'too much': it's knowing your worth and your needs. Expressing what you want is strength, not weakness.

The right person doesn't flee from your clarity — they welcome it.

Example

By owning that she wanted something serious, Nia stopped attracting people who wanted the opposite.

My need for commitment

What do you truly want (exclusivity, a shared project, marriage...)?

Own it

Write: 'I have the right to want commitment and to say so.'

Takeaway — Wanting commitment and saying so is strength, not 'too much'.

The conversation and concrete steps

In practice: pick a good moment, speak in 'I' ('I want to know where we're going', 'I'd like us to be exclusive'), and listen to the answer — actions as much as words. Then build commitment through concrete steps (shared plans, trust, shared vision), welcoming the fears (yours or theirs) without letting them block everything.

Healthy commitment is chosen by two, not wrenched from one.

Example

By calmly saying 'I'd like us to move forward', Karim opened a real conversation that grew the couple.

My conversation

How and when to dare the 'what are we?' talk: _____

Our concrete steps

A concrete step toward commitment (a plan, vision, trust): _____

Takeaway — Commitment is built by two, through concrete steps.

Key takeaways

- Defining the relationship makes you an actor in your story.
- Asking for clarity only scares off the unavailable.
- Clarity attracts the right people and filters the rest.
- Wanting commitment and saying so is strength.
- Speak in 'I' and judge actions as much as words.
- Commitment is built by two, through concrete steps.

Your turn

My clarity

The vagueness to clarify	The thought that holds me back

My commitment

What I truly want	My conversation / my concrete step

YOUR JOURNEY

Your 4-week plan

Week 1

Leave the vagueness, become an actor.

Week 2

Reframe the fear of 'scaring them off'.

Week 3

Own my desire for commitment.

Week 4

Dare the conversation, take a concrete step.

YOUR PLAN

Your action plan

My 'I have the right to want commitment' line:

What I truly want:

My concrete step toward commitment:

From the encounter to commitment: dare clarity, build together.

This guide is a coaching and psychoeducation tool — not therapy. It's for everyone, whatever your gender or orientation. If a date endangers or disrespects you, your safety comes first. © PerfectMatch · EvaTalk.