
Knowing What You Truly Want

Clarity before the encounter

4 psychology approaches · tips — by EvaTalk

TO BEGIN

Clarity before the encounter

Many search for love without truly knowing what they want — and end up replaying the same scripts. Clarity is your compass: it saves you months lost with the wrong people.

This guide helps you know what you truly seek, spot your patterns, and arrive 'ready' to meet someone.

YOUR INTENTION

What you truly seek in a relationship, in one sentence: _____

A compass, not chance

Without clarity, you drift on attraction or fear of being alone — and fall for the same type again. Knowing what TRULY matters to you (values, needs, the life you want) guides your choices.

Clarity doesn't close possibilities: it saves you time.

Example

Marc kept having relationships that ended the same way; by clarifying what he really wanted, he stopped aiming wrong.

My compass

What are your 3 non-negotiable values in a relationship?

Clear

Write: 'Knowing what I seek saves me time.'

Takeaway — Clarity is a compass: it steers you off the wrong paths.

The thoughts that make you settle

'I must settle down', 'I take what comes', 'I don't deserve better': these thoughts push you to accept less than you need, out of fear or urgency.

Reframing them makes your standards legitimate.

Example

'At my age I can't be picky' made Sarah settle, until she saw her needs were still valid.

Spot the settling

Note a thought pushing you to accept less · a fairer version.

My standards

Write: 'I have the right to standards that respect me.'

Takeaway — Having standards that respect you isn't being 'picky'.

Know yourself before searching

You attract better when you're clear and whole. Knowing yourself — your needs, your wounds, what you bring — makes you steadier and fairer in your choices.

Healing or understanding your past keeps you from replaying it.

Example

By understanding her pattern (always the same profiles), Nia could finally choose differently.

My pattern

Which type of person do you often choose, and why?

What I bring

Write 2 things you bring to a relationship: _____

Takeaway — Knowing yourself makes you steadier and fairer in your choices.

Non-negotiables vs preferences

In practice: tell your real non-negotiables (respect, values, life vision) from mere preferences (height, hobbies). And ask yourself honestly whether you're ready to date, or whether you first have a step to take for yourself.

A clear list helps you recognize the right person — and let the wrong ones pass.

Example

By separating the essential (shared values) from the superficial, Sami stopped ruling out good people for bad reasons.

My non-negotiables

Your 3 real non-negotiables (not preferences): _____

My availability

Are you truly ready to date, or is there a step to take first?

Takeaway — Tell your non-negotiables from your mere preferences.

Key takeaways

- Clarity is a compass: it steers you off the wrong paths.
- Standards that respect you $\neq$ being 'picky'.
- Knowing yourself makes you steadier in your choices.
- Spot your pattern: who you often choose, and why.
- Tell non-negotiables (values) from preferences (superficial).
- Ask yourself honestly if you're ready to date.

Your turn

My clarity

My values	The settling thought

My direction

My pattern	My non-negotiables

YOUR JOURNEY

Your 4-week plan

Week 1

Define my values and needs.

Week 2

Reframe what makes me settle.

Week 3

Spot my choosing pattern.

Week 4

List my non-negotiables, check my readiness.

YOUR PLAN

Your action plan

My non-negotiable values:

My pattern to correct:

My 3 non-negotiables:

Know what you seek — and you'll recognize it when you find it.

This guide is a coaching and psychoeducation tool — not therapy. It's for everyone, whatever your gender or orientation. If a date endangers or disrespects you, your safety comes first. © PerfectMatch · EvaTalk.