

Your Wound Doesn't Define You

The first step to free yourself — the EvaTalk method

You know your wound. Now what?

You may already have identified your wound — rejection, abandonment, humiliation, betrayal or injustice. That's a good start. But knowing which one isn't enough to free yourself from it.

This mini-guide won't re-describe the 5 wounds (that's everywhere). It gives you the first concrete step to start freeing yourself — with the EvaTalk method: 4 psychology lenses and one exercise that changes everything.

QUICK REMINDER

The 5 wounds — rejection, abandonment, humiliation, betrayal, injustice — each install a fear and a protective 'mask'. Here, the goal isn't to know yours: it's to start easing it.

Your wound through 4 lenses

Where most content stops at a single (often spiritual) reading, EvaTalk sheds light on your wound through 4 complementary psychology lenses. That's what makes the work truer — and more effective.

Psychodynamic — where it comes from. Your wound formed early, often in childhood. Understanding its origin removes guilt: it's not a flaw, it's a learned protection.

CBT — the thoughts it installs. Each wound whispers automatic thoughts ('I'll be rejected', 'they'll abandon me'). Spotting them means no longer taking them at face value.

Humanistic — separating from it. You are not your wound. Your worth stays intact underneath. Reminding yourself of that is already an act of freedom.

Systemic — how it acts. Your wound replays in your relationships, your couple, your work. Seeing it at work means you can change the script.

Separate the wound from your worth

A simple exercise, to repeat whenever a strong emotion rises. It's based on CBT: what hurts isn't only the situation — it's the thought your wound adds to it.

STEP 1 • SPOT

When you feel hurt, note the thought that surfaces. E.g.: 'They didn't reply → they'll abandon me / I don't matter.'

STEP 2 • NAME

Acknowledge: 'That's my wound talking — not reality.' The wound always exaggerates and generalizes.

STEP 3 • ANSWER

Write a fairer truth: 'Silence isn't abandonment. My worth doesn't depend on this reply.'

→ You are not what your wound tells you.

Your wound × your life

A wound doesn't stay theoretical: it acts, concretely, in the areas that matter most to you.

In love and relationships. It can push you to flee, to over-give, to doubt or to protect yourself. Recognizing its role changes how you love.

In intimacy. Shame, withdrawal, fear of judgment: the wound speaks in sexuality too. Naming it lets you reclaim your pleasure and confidence.

In your identity and your experience. For many, the wound mixes with others' gaze, with identity, sometimes with racial experience. You don't have to carry that alone — this ground deserves dedicated tools.

That's exactly what the EvaTalk guides explore in depth: wound by wound, and theme by theme.
