
Staying Close to Your Husband

Nurturing YOUR bond, despite the sharing

TO BEGIN

Nurturing YOUR bond, despite the sharing

In polygamy, the couple can dissolve into logistics: turns, schedules, children. Yet you have a unique relationship with your husband — different from the one he has with another.

This guide helps you protect and nurture THAT bond which is yours, instead of letting it fade into the routine of sharing.

YOUR INTENTION

What your bond with him most lacks right now: _____

Your bond is unique

Your couple isn't a copy of the one he lives with another wife: your history, your closeness, your in-jokes are yours. Sharing time doesn't erase the singularity of YOUR bond.

Protecting it begins by no longer comparing it to others'.

Example

Khady saw only 'her turn too' — until she remembered all that belonged to just the two of them.

What's yours

What makes your bond with him unique (memories, closeness, codes)?

Stop comparing

Write: 'Our bond is ours — it doesn't compare.'

Takeaway — Your couple is unique: it doesn't compare to another.

Thoughts that put out the couple

'Our bond is gone', 'I'm just a turn on his schedule', 'he's closer to her': these thoughts make you give up before even trying.

Reframing them rekindles the wish to nurture what's still alive.

Example

'What's the point, it's over' paralyzed Aïssatou, until she saw the bond needed nurturing, not burying.

Spot the giving-up

Note a thought that makes you give up on the couple · a fairer version.

What's alive

Write: 'Our bond can be nurtured — it isn't dead.'

Takeaway — A bond is nurtured; don't bury it too soon.

Quality, not quantity

You can't always have more time — but you can make that time truer. Real presence, listening, authenticity: a moment's quality matters more than its length.

Bringing your true self, rather than the 'good wife' facade, revives closeness.

Example

By dropping the role to be herself with him at last, Mariama found a closeness she thought was lost.

True presence

How can you make your next moment with him more present and true?

My true self

An authentic part of you to dare to share with him: _____

Takeaway — A moment's quality matters more than its length.

Build rituals and express your needs

A couple is cultivated: a ritual of yours, a regular conversation, an attention. And you have the right to express what you need to feel loved — without waiting for him to guess.

If despite your efforts the bond is utterly absent or neglected, that's important information, not a fate to endure.

Example

Adama proposed a small ritual (tea, a real talk each turn) — and their bond regained color.

Our ritual

A ritual or moment of yours you could propose: _____

My need

A need to express to feel loved: _____

Takeaway — Build rituals, express your needs; a living bond is maintained.

Key takeaways

- Your couple is unique — it doesn't compare.
- A bond is nurtured; don't bury it too soon.
- A moment's quality matters more than its length.
- Bring your true self, not the 'good wife' facade.
- Build a ritual of yours and express your needs.
- If the bond is utterly neglected, that's information to hear.
