
Breaking the Transgenerational Poverty Cycle

When scarcity is passed down: the systemic first, your part next

4 psychology approaches · by EvaTalk

TO BEGIN

When scarcity is passed down: the systemic first, your part next

Scarcity often passes from generation to generation. First through structural causes (access, opportunity, discrimination) — it's not a personal fault. And also through a relationship with money made of beliefs and habits born of survival.

This guide doesn't promise to 'manifest abundance'. It helps you reclaim the psychological part — the one you have a grip on, in daily life and in business.

YOUR INTENTION

What 'money' awakens in you (fear, lack, mistrust, block): _____

The structural first, the psychological too

Poverty has structural causes first: no 'mindset' replaces fair conditions, and it's not your fault. Alongside, families transmit a relationship with money (beliefs, survival mode) that can be worked on — without erasing the rest.

Holding both at once avoids both denying the systemic and staying passive.

Example

Sami thought himself 'bad with money'; understanding the structural part AND the workable part set him in motion.

The two parts

Which part depends on the system, and which can you work on?

Hold both

Write: 'The systemic isn't my fault; my part, I can work on.'

Takeaway — Poverty is structural first; the psychological part, though, can be worked on.

Scarcity beliefs

'Money is dirty', 'it's not for people like us', 'you must suffer to earn', 'if I have money, I'll lose it': these beliefs, useful in survival mode, end up blocking you.

Reframing them opens decisions fear forbade you.

Example

'Aiming higher is tempting fate' sabotaged Léa, until she saw this fear came from survival, not today's reality.

Spot the belief

Note a scarcity belief about money · a fairer version.

From survival to choice

Write: 'This belief protected me; I can choose another.'

Takeaway — Scarcity beliefs protected you yesterday — they block you today.

Allow yourself security (and more)

You have the right to want security, comfort, even abundance — without guilt or feeling you betray your people. Succeeding financially isn't denying where you come from: it often honors it.

Giving yourself the right to receive is a powerful inner shift.

Example

By allowing herself to aim for real stability without guilt, Nia stopped sabotaging her opportunities.

My right

What would you allow yourself if you felt legitimate to succeed?

Allow myself

Write: 'I have the right to security and more, without guilt.'

Takeaway — You have the right to security and abundance — succeeding isn't betraying.

From survival to building

In practice: leave survival mode (budget, even small savings, plan beyond the month), get financial education, reinvest in yourself and your activity, surround yourself with knowledge and mentorship, and name the real barriers to navigate them strategically. No magical thinking: concrete, repeated gestures. In business, watch for under-charging, fear of investing, and fear of aiming big.

Building means moving from 'surviving the month' to 'building over time'.

Example

By getting trained and ceasing to under-charge, Karim moved his business from survival to building mode.

My gesture

A concrete 'building' gesture (savings, training, fair price) to make: _____

Leave survival

Write: 'I move from survival mode to building mode, one gesture at a time.'

Takeaway — Leave survival mode, get trained, reinvest — concrete gestures, no magic.

Key takeaways

- Poverty is structural first — it's not your fault.
- No 'mindset' replaces fair conditions.
- The psychological part (beliefs, habits) can be worked on.
- Scarcity beliefs protected you yesterday, block you today.
- You have the right to security and abundance, without guilt.
- Leave survival mode: budget, training, reinvestment, fair price.

Your turn

The two parts

System vs my part	The scarcity belief

My building

What I allow myself	My building gesture

YOUR JOURNEY

Your 4-week plan

Week 1

Tell the structural from my workable part.

Week 2

Reframe a scarcity belief.

Week 3

Allow myself security and more.

Week 4

Make a concrete 'building' gesture.

YOUR PLAN

Your action plan

My 'my part, I can work on' line:

The scarcity belief to change:

My building gesture:

Scarcity is passed down — but step by step, you can move from surviving to building.

This guide is a psychoeducation tool, not financial advice. Poverty has structural causes first (access, opportunity, discrimination) — it's not a personal fault, and no 'mindset' replaces fair conditions. This guide works on the psychological part (beliefs, habits) you have a grip on. For your finances, get informed and consult a professional if needed. © PerfectMatch · EvaTalk.