BEFORE YOU BEGIN

Finding the wanting again, together, over time

With time, routine and mental load, desire can fall asleep in a couple — without love having disappeared. It's common, and it doesn't mean it's over.

This guide helps you understand what dulls desire, reconnect with your own, and rekindle it together — without performance pressure.

Your intention

What has changed in your desire or your intimacy: _____

The 4 approaches

This guide works your topic through 4 complementary psychology lenses. Read, do the exercises, fill the workbook — at your own pace.

Psychodynamic — understand the root.

CBT — ease the negative thoughts.

Humanistic — reconcile with yourself.

Systemic — act on your environment.

What dulls desire

Routine, mental load, sliding into a 'roommates' or 'parents' dynamic: daily life can dim desire. And sometimes, as security grows, the mystery that feeds desire shrinks.

Understanding these mechanisms keeps you from believing 'desire is dead'.

Example

Exhausted by daily logistics, Camille and her partner only met as 'parents'. Naming the slide opened a different conversation.

What dulled our desire

What, in your daily life, gradually pushed desire away (routine, fatigue, load, roles)?

Our 'just us' moments

When are you still truly 'lovers' and not just teammates of daily life?

→ My desire isn't dead — it fell asleep under daily life.

The thoughts that switch it off

‘Desire should be spontaneous’, ‘if I have to prompt it, it doesn't count’, ‘after so many years it's normal to lose interest’: these beliefs stop you from acting.

In reality, desire is often ‘responsive’: it comes after you create the context, not necessarily before.

Example

Sure she had to ‘wait for the urge’, Nia never initiated anything. Understanding responsive desire changed everything: the urge came once she set the scene.

My beliefs about desire

Note: a belief that blocks you · a fairer version (e.g. spontaneous vs responsive desire).

Create the context

What sets the scene for you (relaxation, closeness, context)? How to create more?

→ Desire can come after I set the scene — not only before.

Reconnecting with your own desire

Rekindling a couple's desire often starts with reconnecting with your own: what turns you on, your relationship to your body, allowing yourself pleasure as a legitimate part of your life.

Your desire is yours — not a duty or an obligation.

Example

By reconnecting with what felt good (no pressure), Léa found a part of herself... and momentum in the relationship.

What turns me on

Write, for yourself: what feeds your desire (context, sensations, imagination, closeness).

Allowing myself pleasure

What stops you from giving yourself the right to pleasure? A small permission to grant yourself?

→ My desire is mine — I have the right to cultivate it.

Rekindling concretely, together

Concretely: cultivate closeness outside the bedroom (desire feeds on connection), create moments without 'performance' pressure, talk about wants, leave autopilot, and reintroduce novelty and anticipation.

Desire is cultivated like a garden, not flipped like a switch.

Example

By keeping a real weekly time together — no screens, no to-do list — Sofia and her partner saw closeness, then desire, return.

Our closeness

What connection moment (outside sex) could you protect regularly?

Leaving autopilot

A small novelty or anticipation to introduce (a date, a message, a change of setting)?

→ Desire is cultivated — through closeness, without pressure.

Practical tips & advice

Tips & advice

- Desire isn't only spontaneous: it's often 'responsive' (it comes once the context is set).
- Cultivate closeness outside the bedroom: desire feeds on connection.
- Ease the mental load — it's one of the first desire-killers.
- Create intimate moments without 'performance' pressure or a goal.
- Talk about your wants, and reintroduce novelty and anticipation.
- If low desire weighs on you over time, a sex therapist can help.
