BEFORE YOU BEGIN

Doing the essential, without carrying it all

Too much to do, never enough time, the feeling of running without progress: overload isn't only about organization — it's also about priorities, limits, and letting go.

This guide helps you understand what stops you delegating and prioritizing, choose what truly matters, and tool yourself concretely.

Your intention

What devours your time most (or what you can't let go of): _____

The 4 approaches

This guide works your topic through 4 complementary psychology lenses. Read, do the exercises, fill the workbook — at your own pace.

Psychodynamic — understand the root.

CBT — ease the negative thoughts.

Humanistic — reconcile with yourself.

Systemic — act on your environment.

Why you can't delegate

Perfectionism, 'I do it better and faster', fear of disappointing, the need to control everything: often what overloads you comes from there, more than from poor organization.

Spotting it lets you let go of what you don't have to carry.

Example

Unable to delegate 'so it's done right', Marc burned out. Understanding his perfectionism helped him let go.

What stops me letting go

Why do you keep it all (perfectionism, control, fear of disappointing)?

What I could let go

List 3 tasks you could delegate or stop — and what stops you.

→ I don't have to carry it all for it to be done right.

The thoughts that overload

'I must do everything', 'if I delegate it'll be done badly', 'saying no = disappointing': these thoughts pile up tasks and forbid prioritizing.

Softening them makes sorting possible.

Example

Sure 'everything was urgent', Nia sorted urgent/important. Half could wait.

Overload journal

Note: the overloading thought · a fairer version.

Reframe the 'no'

Turn 'saying no = disappointing' into 'saying no to this = saying yes to my priorities'.

→ Not everything is urgent — I can sort and prioritize.

Choosing what truly matters

Managing your time well isn't doing more: it's aligning your time with your priorities and values, rather than others' urgency.

Your time reflects what you choose to honor.

Example

By protecting a morning slot for the essential, Léa finally progressed on what truly mattered.

My real priorities

What are your 3 real priorities (work/personal)? Does your time reflect them?

Align my time

What eats your time without serving your priorities? What do you decide to do about it?

→ My time should reflect my priorities — not others' urgency.

Concrete methods

Concretely: prioritize (urgent/important), schedule your priorities in protected blocks, delegate (what, to whom, how), say no, and limit interruptions (emails, notifications).

A delegated 'imperfect' task beats an undone one.

Example

By delegating and blocking notifications in the morning, Sofia doubled her 'deep work' time.

My matrix

Sort your current tasks: urgent/important · important not-urgent · urgent not-important · neither.

My delegation

Pick 1 task to delegate: to whom · how to explain it · what you accept to let go.

→ Prioritize and delegate — to do the essential without carrying it all.

Practical tips & advice

Tips & advice

- Tell urgent from important (matrix): not everything is an emergency.
- Schedule your priorities in protected blocks (and defend them).
- Delegate what can be, and let go of perfectionism.
- Say no or 'not now' without guilt.
- Batch and limit interruptions (emails, notifications).
- Protect time for the important non-urgent (or it never gets done).

PLAN

Your 4-week plan

Week 1 — Understand what stops me letting go.

Week 2 — Soften the thoughts that overload.

Week 3 — Choose my real priorities.

Week 4 — Prioritize, schedule, delegate.

Your plan in 3 lines

- My #1 priority to protect:
- The task I delegate:
- The 'no' I set:
