BEFORE YOU BEGIN

Confidence, integrity and lucidity

Desiring a relationship or marriage with an affluent man is a legitimate choice — like any partner choice. But for a Black woman, it comes with specific challenges: the ‘gold digger’ stigma, class and power differences, social and family scrutiny, the need to stay yourself without losing yourself.

This guide supports you with psychoeducation and CBT tools to position yourself with confidence, integrity and lucidity — and build a healthy, aligned relationship. Not to manipulate: a real relationship is built on authenticity.

Your intention

The challenge that speaks to you most in this kind of relationship: _____

The 4 approaches

This guide works your topic through 4 complementary psychology lenses. Read, do the exercises, fill the workbook — at your own pace.

Psychodynamic — understand the root.

CBT — ease the negative thoughts.

Humanistic — reconcile with yourself.

Systemic — act on your environment.

What you may face

The 'gold digger' stigma (often amplified by misogynoir), class and code differences, financial power imbalance, in-law scrutiny, sometimes exoticization or fetishization: these challenges are real.

Naming them means no longer carrying them as personal flaws.

Example

Constantly suspected of 'being after his money', Aïcha understood the suspicion said more about others' gaze than about her.

My challenges

Which challenges (stigma, class, power, in-laws) weigh most on you?

It comes from outside

Write: 'The 'gold digger' stigma comes from a social gaze — it doesn't define me.'

→ These challenges are real — but they aren't flaws in me.

The thoughts that sabotage your confidence

'I don't belong here', 'he's doing me a favor', 'I must accept everything to keep him', 'my worth = what he has': these thoughts place you as a supplicant, not a partner.

Reframing them restores your stance as an equal.

Example

Sure she 'had to accept everything', Léa stayed silent. Understanding she was an equal partner, not a guest, changed everything.

Thoughts journal

Note: a thought that places you 'below' · an equal's truth.

My intrinsic worth

Write: 'My worth is intrinsic — it doesn't depend on his wealth. I'm a partner, not a supplicant.'

→ I'm a full partner — my worth doesn't depend on his money.

Not losing yourself

Being drawn to security or ambition is legitimate — but the relationship must be real. Keep your values, your limits, your authenticity; don't transform yourself to 'deserve' to be there.

And stay lucid: a man who controls through money or looks down on your class is a red flag.

Example

By no longer denying herself to 'fit the milieu', Fatou drew respect — and spotted who truly looked down on her.

My limits

What limit won't you cross, even for this relationship (values, dignity, independence)?

My red flags

Note 2 warning signs (control through money, class contempt, lack of respect).

→ I stay myself — a healthy relationship never requires me to lose myself.

Tips (ethical ones)

Concretely: frequent places and networks aligned with your aspirations (while staying yourself), talk early about values, money and projects, keep your independence (financial, social, your network), and learn about the legal aspects of a union (marital regimes, prenuptial agreement — to review with a legal professional).

Compatibility outweighs a bank balance — always.

Example

By keeping her own work and financial independence, Nia approached her relationship as an equal — without fear of 'losing everything'.

My independence

How do you protect your independence (income, network, projects) in the relationship?

Key conversations

A conversation to have early (values, money, life project): _____

→ Lucidity, independence, authenticity — that's a healthy, aligned relationship.

Practical tips & advice

Tips & advice

- Your worth doesn't depend on his wealth — you're a full partner.
- The 'gold digger' stigma is often misogynoir: don't let it define your self-esteem.
- Keep your integrity: a healthy relationship is built on authenticity, not manipulation.
- Frequent places/networks aligned with your aspirations — while staying yourself.
- Talk early about values, money and projects: compatibility outweighs the bank balance.
- Keep your independence (financial, social, your network) — never depend to the point of losing your power.
- Learn about marital regimes / prenuptial agreements with a notary or lawyer.
- Spot red flags: control through money, class contempt, lack of respect.

PLAN

Your 4-week plan

Week 1 — Name the challenges (without carrying them as flaws).

Week 2 — Reframe a thought that sabotages my confidence.

Week 3 — Clarify my limits & red flags.

Week 4 — Practical lucidity: independence & key conversations.

Your plan in 3 lines

- My truth: 'My worth is intrinsic.'
- The limit I won't cross:
- The key conversation to have early:

TO CLOSE

Your worth is intrinsic — you deserve a healthy, aligned, whole relationship.
