Learning to feel safe, from the inside

The abandonment wound is that visceral fear of being left alone, abandoned or forgotten. It can push you to cling, to seek constant reassurance, to dread solitude.

This guide helps you understand this wound and build, little by little, a security that comes from you — not only from others.

YOUR INTENTION

Where the fear of being alone or left shows up most: _____

Where the abandonment wound comes from

It often arises from early experiences of lack or separation. To protect yourself, you develop the 'dependent mask': clinging, doing everything not to be left, tolerating solitude poorly.

Understanding this mechanism already softens the fear.

Example

Léa panicked the moment a message went unanswered. Recognizing her abandonment wound helped her stop believing she was 'too much'.

My mask

How do you cling (or seek reassurance) when you fear being left?

Understand it

Write: 'Clinging is a learned protection — not a flaw.'

Takeaway — Clinging is a learned protection, not a flaw.

The thoughts of abandonment

'They'll leave me', 'I can't be alone', 'if they pull away, it's over': these thoughts amplify the fear and drive clinging, which sometimes pushes the other away.

Reframing them calms the alarm.

Example

'Their silence = they're leaving me' panicked Marc. Often the other was just busy: the thought dramatized.

Thoughts journal

Note an abandonment thought · a fairer, calmer version.

Distinguish

Write: 'Distance isn't abandonment.'

Takeaway — Distance isn't abandonment.

Securing yourself from within

You can become your own secure base: learning to be well with yourself, to reassure yourself, to tolerate solitude without experiencing it as danger.

Your worth doesn't depend on someone's constant presence.

Example

By taming time alone (which she dreaded), Fatou discovered she could be her own ally.

My secure base

What feels good and reassures you, without depending on someone?

Tame solitude

A moment alone you could turn into a resourcing moment: _____

Takeaway — You can become your own secure base.

Safe bonds, without clinging

Clinging tries to avoid abandonment, but exhausts the bond. Healing means cultivating relationships where you can express your needs without grasping, and trust in duration.

A healthy bond holds distance as much as closeness.

Example

Rather than send anxious messages, Nia calmly expressed her need — and the bond grew more solid.

Express without grasping

A need you could express calmly, without clinging: _____

My safe bonds

Which relationships give you a sense of stability?

Takeaway — A healthy bond holds distance as much as closeness.
