
Foreplay & Slowness

Desire loves time

TO BEGIN

Desire loves time

We call them 'foreplay', as if they were a step before the 'real' sex. In reality, slowness and rising desire ARE the pleasure — especially for many women, whose arousal needs time.

This guide helps you slow down, build desire, and savor each step, without rushing toward a 'goal'.

YOUR INTENTION

What rushing makes you lose in your intimate moments: _____

Arousal needs time

Arousal, especially female, builds gradually: rushing cuts pleasure before it settles. Foreplay isn't an obligatory 'warm-up', but pleasure in its own right.

Understanding this changes your relationship to time: slowness becomes an ally, not a loss.

Example

Sarah felt 'we go too fast' without knowing how to say it; naming her need for slowness transformed her intimate moments.

The role of time

What could slowness change for you?

Not a warm-up

Write: 'Slowness isn't a waste of time — it's the pleasure.'

Takeaway — Slowness isn't a prelude to pleasure: it IS the pleasure.

The thoughts of urgency

'We don't have time', 'we need to get to the point', 'he's impatient': these thoughts make you skip what would do you the most good.

Reframing them lets you savor.

Example

'No dawdling' pushed Nia to skip what truly aroused her; deprogramming the urgency, everything became more intense.

Spot the urgency

Note a thought that rushes you · a calmer version.

Allow myself to savor

Write: 'I have the right to take my time.'

Takeaway — You have the right to take your time.

Presence and sensuality

Slowing down means returning to presence: feeling, breathing, savoring each sensation, across the whole body — not just the genital area. Sensuality is wider than 'performance'.

Inhabiting the moment, rather than racing to a goal, opens a far richer pleasure.

Example

By focusing on sensations rather than 'what's next', Fatou rediscovered a pleasure she'd forgotten.

The whole body

Which zones/sensations (beyond genital) would you like to explore more?

Be present

A way to return to the moment rather than the 'goal': _____

Takeaway — Sensuality is wider than performance.

Communicate rhythm and anticipation

In practice: say the rhythm that suits you, cultivate anticipation (a word, a gesture during the day), and explore the whole body before what's next. Making it last isn't 'wasting time': it's giving time to pleasure.

Desire loves being nourished; anticipation is already pleasure.

Example

By sending each other playful messages during the day, Léa and her partner arrived in the evening already full of desire.

The rhythm I want

How to say (gently) the rhythm that suits you? _____

Anticipation

A way to cultivate anticipation during the day: _____

Takeaway — Communicate your rhythm; anticipation is already pleasure.

Key takeaways

- Foreplay isn't a prelude: it IS the pleasure.
- Arousal needs time, especially for many women.
- You have the right to take your time.
- Explore the whole body, not just the genital area.
- Return to presence rather than a 'goal'.
- Cultivate anticipation: it's already pleasure.
