BEFORE YOU BEGIN

Rediscovering intimacy together, after baby

After a birth, sexuality changes: fatigue, a transformed body, lower desire, apprehensions, a new parent identity. It's normal, and common.

This guide helps you rediscover a fulfilling intimacy — with time, gentleness and communication, without pressure.

Your intention

What has changed most in your intimacy since baby arrived: _____

The 4 approaches

This guide works your topic through 4 complementary psychology lenses. Read, do the exercises, fill the workbook — at your own pace.

Psychodynamic — understand the root.

CBT — ease the negative thoughts.

Humanistic — reconcile with yourself.

Systemic — act on your environment.

What changes after baby

Intense fatigue, a new load, a transformed relationship to the body, sliding into a 'parents' identity, apprehension (pain, self-image), sometimes baby blues: all of this affects desire.

Knowing it's common already removes a lot of pressure.

Example

Exhausted and 'only parents', Camille and her partner lost each other. Naming the slide opened the dialogue.

What changed

What most weighs on your desire/your intimacy since the birth?

It's common

Write: 'Sexuality changing after a baby is normal — we're allowed time.'

→ Sexuality changing after baby is normal — we're allowed time.

The thoughts that weigh

'I should already want it', 'my body isn't desirable anymore', 'we'll never get there': these thoughts (often fed by comparison) add needless pressure.

Softening them makes the restart gentler.

Example

Sure her body 'wasn't desirable anymore', Nia realized that was a judgment — not her partner's reality.

My thoughts

Note: a thought that pressures you · a gentler version.

My postpartum body

Write a kind sentence toward your body that carried/gave birth.

→ My body deserves gentleness, not judgment.

Reclaiming your body & desire

With kindness and patience, you can reclaim your postpartum body and your desire — at your pace. There's no rush, and your desire will return.

Gentleness toward yourself precedes the return of wanting.

Example

By giving herself time without guilt, Léa saw her desire return gently, without forcing.

At my pace

What would help you feel good in your body right now (without pressure)?

Tenderness first

What form of tenderness/closeness (outside sex) could you find first?

→ My desire will return at my pace — tenderness first.

Rebuilding intimacy together

Concretely: communicate (fears, wants), share the load (desire breathes when you're not carrying it all alone), restart through tenderness, and go gently after the medical green light. In case of pain or worry: midwife/doctor.

Intimacy is found together, not by force.

Example

By sharing the night load and really talking again, Sofia and her partner found closeness — then desire.

Share the load

A load (nights, tasks) to rebalance to free up energy: _____

Communicate & restart

A fear or want you'd like to share with your partner: _____

→ Communicate, share the load, restart gently — that's the path.

Practical tips & advice

Tips & advice

- It's normal for sexuality to change after a birth — be patient with yourself.
- Wait for the medical green light (postnatal check-up) and listen to your body.
- Fatigue and mental load brake desire: share them.
- Restart through tenderness and closeness, without performance pressure.
- Communicate your fears and wants, without judgment.
- In case of pain or worry, talk to your midwife or doctor.

PLAN

Your 4-week plan

Week 1 — Welcome what changed (without pressure).

Week 2 — Soften thoughts and the view of my body.

Week 3 — Find tenderness, at my pace.

Week 4 — Communicate & share the load.

Your plan in 3 lines

- What I allow myself (patience, gentleness):
- The load we share better:
- The tenderness we find first:

TO CLOSE

After baby, intimacy is found gently — at your pace.
