Reconnecting with your body and desire, at your pace

After childbirth, everything changes: the body, hormones, fatigue, identity. It's very normal for desire to drop for a while — it's neither a flaw nor an end, it's a stage.

This guide helps you reconnect with your body and desire at YOUR pace, without pressure or comparison.

YOUR INTENTION

What has changed for you, and what weighs on you most right now: _____

A normal, temporary drop

Fatigue, hormonal upheaval (especially while breastfeeding), a recovering body, the baby's mental load: all very normal reasons for a drop in desire. It's not a lack of love, and it evolves.

And before any resumption, wait for medical clearance (postnatal check-up).

Example

Sarah worried about 'not wanting it anymore'; understanding it was normal and temporary hugely relieved her.

Demystify

What pressure do you feel around 'resuming' a sex life?

Normal and temporary

Write: 'This drop is normal and temporary — not a flaw.'

Takeaway — The drop in desire after baby is normal and temporary.

The thoughts that rush you

'I don't recognize myself', 'he'll get tired of me', 'I should want it already': these thoughts add pressure to an already loaded moment.

Reframing them lets you go at your pace.

Example

'I'm not a desirable woman anymore' weighed on Nia, until she understood her body just needed time.

Spot the pressure

Note a thought that rushes you · a gentler version.

At my pace

Write: 'I have no timeline to meet.'

Takeaway — You have no timeline to meet — your pace is the right one.

Compassion for your changing body

Your body did something immense: it deserves compassion, not judgment. Reconnecting to it, gently, without comparing to 'before', is part of the path.

Your worth and sensuality don't depend on your immediate availability.

Example

By no longer comparing herself to her 'before' body, Fatou could, little by little, reclaim her sensuality.

With compassion

A kind word to offer your body that gave so much: _____

Without comparison

Write: 'I reconnect to my body without comparing it to before.'

Takeaway — Your body deserves compassion, not judgment.

Gentleness, communication, and support

In practice: resume gently, communicate with your partner (intimacy doesn't reduce to sex: cuddles, tenderness count), think of lubricant (dryness is common while breastfeeding), and consult for pain or lasting difficulty.

Tenderness without pressure often reopens desire, in its own time.

Example

By betting first on tenderness and communication, without pressure to 'resume', Léa saw desire return naturally.

Our intimacy

A form of non-sexual intimacy to cultivate meanwhile: _____

Consult if needed

Write: 'Pain or lasting difficulty → I talk to a professional.'

Takeaway — Gentleness, communication and tenderness reopen desire, in its time.

Key takeaways

- The drop in desire after baby is normal and temporary.
- Wait for medical clearance before resuming.
- You have no timeline to meet.
- Your body deserves compassion, not judgment.
- Intimacy doesn't reduce to sex: tenderness and cuddles count.
- Dryness (breastfeeding): lubricant; lasting pain → consult.

Sexual-health topics (pain, erection, menopause...) often have a medical dimension: a professional (doctor, gynecologist, sex therapist, pelvic-floor physiotherapist) can truly help.
